Kid-Proof Your Dogs; Dog-Proof Your Kids

High-pitched laughter peeling behind her, Nancy ran around the corner of the house smack dab into the dog chained by the garage. Unnerved by the noise and startled by the child, the dog lunged and bit Nancy on the nose. She screamed, and the dog bit again. Nancy ended up with several stitches in her face and nightmares; the dog was euthanized for biting; and both families were traumatized.

The tragedy could have been avoided if Nancy's folks and the dog's owners had been prepared.

First of all, a dog should never be chained outside unattended. Most dogs of guard or working heritage suffer personality quirks when tied and many become downright aggressive. Dogs are better off in fenced areas, where they can see the barrier between them and the world, where they can feel somewhat safe from noisy, frolicking children. In addition, many dogs instinctively equate the high-pitched sounds of children with the distress sounds of prey animals, and they react by biting the child as they would have bitten the prey animal in the wild.

Second, children should be taught how to behave around dogs, even if their own family does not own a dog. For example, a child should never approach a strange dog without asking the owner if it's okay to pat the dog. If the child sees a loose dog on the street, he should not approach it even if he knows the dog belongs to his friend. He should tell someone that he saw the dog, but should make no attempt to pat or grab it.

Nor should he scream or run away, for these actions can result in an attack by the dog. Running frequently says "prey" to the dog and triggers the chase response in his brain. Once triggered this response is almost impossible to interrupt. The dog is reacting to chemical stimulus, not rational thought, and is extremely difficult to sidetrack.

Most dogs, even those that are well-trained, do not consider children as figures of authority. Furthermore, since children frequently stare intently at animals, a dog may feel threatened by this short person who is trying to catch him. Even the best-natured dog may bite to protect himself in these circumstances, especially if he feels cornered.

Once a child is given permission to approach a dog, they should present their closed fist for the dog to sniff. This protects the fingers in case the dog is frightened and tries to nip. Children should never hug a dog that is not their own, and should only hug their own dog very gently IF the dog can tolerate the hug. Children should be taught to never hit dogs with their hands or an object, and to never tease a dog in any fashion. Many dog bites occur because the child teases the pet beyond endurance. They should also be taught to lower their voices when playing with the dog, and to leave the dog alone when he's sleeping, eating, or ill.

Dog caretakers share the responsibility for bite prevention as well. The more a dog is exposed to GENTLE children, the more tolerant of children they will become. Socialization can be as simple as walking the dog near a playground where children are making noise, running about, playing ball, throwing a Frisbee, playing soccer, or walking through the neighborhood while the kids wait for the school bus. Constant exposure of this type will accustom the dog to the presence and antics of children.

The dog should never be left alone with a child less than five years of age. A young child may challenge or injure the dog unintentionally and the result could be tragic. Dogs and children should be separated at snack time so the dog doesn't learn to steal food from tiny hands. The dog should have a place he can call his own, a retreat, a private room, a den. The children should never be allowed to bother the dog when he is in his place. If the dog has access to a fenced yard, owners should make sure that neighborhood children cannot accidentally or intentionally tease him.

Kids often begin by goading the dog to bark then to snarl. Or they may throw things at him to chase him away from the fence. However it begins, the end result is usually the same. The kids learn that teasing the dog gives them a feeling of power tinged with the possibility of danger and the dog learns to hate kids. This hatred may be manifest as fear or as aggression, and may end when a child is bitten and the dog is taken to the shelter where they will most likely be killed. If the dog does not like the children, the children must change their behavior. Most dogs are wary of staring, of quick movements, and of high-pitched screams, all of which are typical of small children.

Here are a few hints to alleviate the tension between dogs and children:

Provide a crate where the dog can escape the attention of boisterous or over-zealous children. Teach children to leave the dog alone when he's in the crate, to pat him gently – no squeezing around the neck please – and leave him alone while he's eating. Do not play tug-o-war with any dog that has access to children. A dog that learns to tug on any item will soon figure that anything he can grab is his, even if it's a child's toy, clothing or appendage.

Teach children not to run past the dog and scream, for this can excite the dog and lead to dominant and even aggressive behavior. Never tie a dog in the yard or keep them outside when no one is home. Children tend to tease tethered dogs even without realizing it, which can lead to aggressive behavior. Many instances of dogs attacking children occur when the dog is tethered in the yard and a screaming or running child enters its space. The sight of a child and a dog napping together on the sofa or the floor, playing in the yard, or contemplating the sunset is a wondrous thing. The potential relationship between a child and the dog who considers himself the family guardian is precious, and it needs to be nurtured and guided. Families can accomplish this by teaching the dog and the child to respect and cherish each other. If this can be done, fewer children will be bitten and fewer dogs will be killed for aggressive behavior.
